Mental Health in the Workplace

Mental health has become an important factor in the workplace in recent years. The effects of the pandemic, coupled with economic stress, have created a workforce with a growing need for mental health services.^{1,2}

For many employees, common mental illnesses and disorders like depression and anxiety can have a major impact on their performance on the job and happiness. These conditions manifest themselves in a display of persistent sadness, a lack of interest or pleasure, sleep disturbance, change in appetite, tiredness and poor concentration. Depression is a leading cause of disability worldwide.³ And one in five American adults experiences a mental health condition each year.⁴

In many cases, these conditions go untreated due to a lack of support. In a recent study, 28% of all adults with a mental illness reported they were not able to receive the treatment they needed.⁵ Most indicated they could not receive necessary treatment because they could not afford it.⁵

This is where opportunities arise for employers and HR decision-makers to help make a difference. A recent survey found that 87% of employees think actions from their employers would help their mental health, and 81% of workers agree that how employers support mental health will be an important consideration for them when they look for future work.^{6,7} Prioritizing employee mental health is not just a good practice, it's a crucial component that should be included in every employer's benefit strategy.

As a benefits broker and advisor, you have an opportunity to provide robust, high-quality voluntary benefit solutions that can make a world of difference for clients in need of support.

From the President & CEO

With a background in mental health counseling, I have seen firsthand the impact mental health programs can have on employees and their well-being. In today's fast-paced environment, it's imperative for employees to have access to resources and services to support their mental health.

At Renaissance, we understand this and are committed to helping employers promote a stronger work/life balance for their employees. From offering group voluntary benefits such as disability and life insurance that help foster financial well-being, to adding innovative non-insurance benefits like our robust EAP that enhance group life products, we are continually looking for ways to help.

As the brokers who play an important role in helping clients create strong benefits packages, we encourage you to consider the importance of mental health support in the workplace. Together, we can help create a healthier workforce.

Diana Steinhoff, LMHC

President and CEO, Renaissance Benefits

A Healthy Workplace Can Increase Productivity

- ✓ Healthier employees are less likely to call in sick or use vacation time due to illness.⁹
- ✓ Workers with fair or poor mental health are estimated to have nearly 12 days of unplanned absences annually compared with 2.5 days for all other workers. This missed work is estimated to cost the economy $47.6 billion annually in lost productivity.⁹
- ✓ Companies that support workplace health have a greater percentage of employees at work every day than those that do not.⁹

Supporting Employees Means Providing the Right Benefits

Employers can help address the need for mental health support in the workplace by offering the right mix of voluntary benefits. While dental and vision insurance help support oral and vision health, as well as overall health, disability and life insurance help support employees' financial health and well-being. Group life and disability insurance can play important roles in alleviating stress when an unexpected event, such as illness, injury or death, disrupts financial security.
